

June 17, 2015

To Whom It May Concern:

I am happy to add my recommendation for Adam Jackson as an outstanding individual who will be an asset to whatever organization he chooses to align himself. Adam wants to be the best he can be, and he puts his energy into ensuring that his work shows it. He has innate and already-developed skills that are difficult teach someone.

It was my pleasure to be Adam's teacher in a Public Relations class during Spring Semester at Brigham Young University-Idaho in 2015. He immediately stood out as one who was interested, eager, and engaged. He was a front-row participant, and he made himself an appropriately frequent contributor to discussions. I have observed him to be smart and to offer constructive input when appropriate. Best yet, he does this in a firm but polite manner.

Adam's leadership is evident through the way he participates in groups and how he handles himself when speaking one-on-one. He was liked and seen by his classmates as an approachable leader and influencer.

You will do well to make Adam Jackson a part of your organization. You can count on your positive first impression to be proven true as you witness for yourself someone who will consistently dedicate himself to his success and yours.

Sincerely,

Brett Sampson
Public Affairs Director